

SOME DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE EDE LANGUAGE AND THE VIETNAMESE LANGUAGE

Author: Nguyen Ngoc Chinh, Niê H'Loanh, Ngo Thi Huong Giang

*University of Foreign Language studies, The University of Danang; nnchinh@ufl.udn.vn
Master Student Course II, Linguistics Major, Tay Nguyen University
The University of Danang*

Abstract:

In linguistics, comparing the Vietnamese language with the language of ethnic minorities has been the interest of many language researchers in the country and in the world. However, the study of Vietnamese and Ede languages so far still has relatively new problems and there is not much agreement among researchers. Ede belongs to Malayo-Polynesian language group, with ties to Austronesian languages and continents. Like Vietnamese, EDE is an isolating type of language. Although classified into the same type, Ede has distinctive features compared with Vietnamese to clarify this issue, the article will explore some of the differences between the Ede and the Vietnamese language in terms of phonetics, vocabulary, grammar.

Key words: Language; The language of ethnic minorities; The Ede language; Isolating language; Distinctive traits.